

An impressionistic oil painting of a forest scene. The foreground and middle ground are filled with trees whose foliage is rendered in vibrant, textured strokes of orange, yellow, and red, suggesting autumn. The trunks of the trees are dark and vertical. In the background, a range of mountains is depicted with cool, blue and purple tones, contrasting with the warm colors of the trees. The sky is a mix of light blue and white, with visible brushstrokes. The overall style is expressive and painterly, with a focus on color and light.

Gregory Packard's paintings are filled with exuberance, life, and light. His canvases are painted in an expressive manner through a wet-on-wet technique or a broken color method that is akin to the impressionists such as Monet. The surfaces of his paintings are rich with relief, direct brushstrokes, and a confidence that reflects painting in its purest form. Whether he is exploring aspen forests, floral still lifes, or intimate scenes found in nature, they all are filled with a sense of joy and wonder. Gregory sums up his goal with each piece in his words below:

"If I were a branch on that tree it would be my desire to create little blossoms of color that you can bring into your life and home."

"... It is this daily life we live, the nature of ourselves and our world, that so excites me when standing before my canvas — life's vital creation that is my source of inspiration and humility."
